

Shavu'ot in Baghdad, 1941

By Joe Samuels

In Baghdad, the temperature in summer rises to over 110 degrees Fahrenheit in the shade. Growing up in the 1930's and 1940's, sun eclipses during the summer days were very common. We were not only in total darkness, but it was hard to breathe. The desert heat, influenced by strong winds generated thick sand storms.

Then, there was the hottest summer I remember. The year was 1941. The temperature rose to 120, 130 or 150 degrees Fahrenheit. This devastating heat affected only one group of citizens, the largest and oldest minority in Baghdad—the Jewish community. The heat began on April 22nd. I was 11 years old. At this time a pro-Nazi coup headed by Rashid Ali, aided by Al Husaini, the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, deposed the government. King Faisal and the Regent fled. The media, all controlled by the new Junta, began a campaign of anti-Semitism.

Newspaper articles describing the Jews as spies and traitors began to appear daily. News on Radio Baghdad featured the capture of Jews directing British planes with flashlights. Random arrests and torture brought deep fear to our hearts and raised the temperature of our blood. My older brother, Aboudi, 27, was beaten up at night by Muslim youths while on his way home. He developed a high fever and started hallucinating.

I was overwhelmed with fright and stricken with panic. My father and my older brothers, trying to protect me and my younger brother, were always whispering. They asked me not to be present when they talked. This increased my anxiety. I couldn't sleep at night, and I cried for no reason. I could sense danger to my family and my life.

When British troops arrived at the outskirts of Baghdad, the coup leaders fled the country. For some unknown reason, the British waited two days to enter Baghdad. That created a power vacuum. The boiling heat was reached on June 1 and 2, 1941, days on which fell the feast of Shavuot—Shavuot, when Jews around the world celebrate receiving the Torah on Mount Sinai some 3500 years ago. This Shavuot in Iraq, soldiers and policemen in civilian clothes joined by slum dwellers began looting and burning Jewish homes and businesses, killing any Jew in sight, and raping women. The Farhud, as it is known in Arabic (“violent dispossession”), was as significant as Kristlenacht in Germany, and demonstrated the hatred exported to the Middle East by Hitler and his generals. Baghdad was in smoke. It was another eclipse with no sand storm.

We bolted our front door and reinforced it with heavy furniture. My older brother, Eli, electrified the fence over the garden wall. My uncle's house was looted. But, we were saved. Life went on, influenced by the philosophy in the Jewish survival kit: we began to live with hope and refused to act as victims.

After 19 years of living under occupation with fear, and unpredictable conditions, I took the train to Basra. From there, I was smuggled out of Iraq by boat to Iran. The boat behind the one I was in—captured. Those unlucky boys and young men were tortured and worse. But we escaped. On March 2, 1950, I tasted freedom for the first time when I touched the ground in Israel.

I compare my life in Baghdad to a kumquat. Its skin is bittersweet, and the interior is sweet and sour. Discontent, disappointments, and distress mix with happy times, blissful events and pleasant memories. Now, living in the present drowns the unpleasantness of the past and brightens my outlook towards the future. Living with hope is like making this small citrus fruit into marmalade, with a provocative flavor, inspiring aroma and cheerful texture.

June 1 & 2, 2011 mark the 70th anniversary of the Farhud. I join with all those who seek, cherish, and appreciate freedom, to stand up against anti-Semitism. I join my community to commemorate my Jewish brothers and sisters who were murdered and injured, and offer compassion to those whose homes were looted and lives destroyed. I pray that we will never again see such episodes, and Israel will dwell in peace.
