Mistaken Anger

Rabbi Dr. Mordechai Schiffman

Redacted from Aish.com

At the inauguration of the Mishkan, the Tabernacle, a celebration is in order... Yet the elation turns quickly to tragedy, when Aharon's sons, Nadav and Avihu, [die] after they offer a foreign fire on the altar.

Aharon is silent. The ceremony must proceed as planned. The usual regulations of mourning are suspended. Moshe informs Aharon and his remaining children to eat from the Meal and Peace offerings as intended but does not mention anything specifically about the Sin offering. When he discovers that they burned the whole animal and didn't eat [from the Sin offering], Moshe expresses anger.

Aharon defends the decision, arguing that after all he has experienced on that day, God wouldn't want them to eat [the Sin offering]. Moshe hears Aharon's argument and is pleased. The Sages explain that Moshe knew [that Aharon shouldn't eat that], but had forgotten. The Midrash identifies this as one of three times that Moshe became angry and, consequently, forgot what he was supposed to do.

Another Midrash reports a fascinating dispute between two sages about the sequence. Did Moshe's anger lead him to make a mistake? Or, did making a mistake cause him to get angry?

Chanania ben Yehuda argues that Moshe's anger led to his mistake. However, Rabbi Yehuda questions this analysis because if it wasn't for the mistake, Moshe never would have become angry in the first place. The mistake led to the anger, not the other way around.
